Yesterday, in what was a very star-studded presentation at the Steve Jobs Theater in Cupertino, California, Apple finally announced its new streaming service, Apple TV. Suffice it to say that the upcoming line-up looks good and all we want to know is how we can watch it all and how long we will have to wait. In addition to the original content, coming from Apple later this year, it was also announced yesterday that the Apple TV app is getting an exciting revamp: a new a la carte-style subscription called Apple TV Channels, which will offer the likes of Showtime, Starz, HBO, CBS All Access, Bravo, the Smithsonian Channel, EPIX, Tastemade, and a ton more. This means that instead of connecting between services, you can access everything you want to watch (reported from more than 150 third-party video channels and streaming services) within a single app without paying for packages that include additional channels that you don't need. The new app will be available from May via a software update. But the Apple TV and the new channel service aren't just for users who have Apple TVs. The Apple TV app, which is currently available on iPhone, iPad and Apple TV, also comes to Samsung smart TVs starting this spring, and Amazon Fire TV, LG, Roku, Sony, and Vizio platforms at some point thereafter. Plus it will also be coming to the Mac this fall. While there is no official launch date for Apple TV yet, Tim Cook has announced that it will also be coming this fall. (And it will be worth the wait if Oprah, Steven Spielberg, J.J. Abrams, Sarah Barey and Reese Witherspoon should serve as any indication.) The content will be ad-free and available for offline viewing anywhere you can use the Apple TV app. In addition, all content - both original and not - is compatible with Family Sharing. No word on the price, but clearly, Apple hopes that viewers will flock to its new Apple TV app as a single place for all streaming content, instead of viewing Apple TV as another streaming service to add to what's already a crowded box. Apple launched the Apple TV in November. The streaming service costs $4.99 a month and features originally produced by seriesHere in every show currently on Apple TV. To compete with a host of other streaming services now elbowing their way into one-time exclusively theatrical awards shows, devouring traditional screen actors, and hitting your credit card in excess of $16 a month (remember when Netflix was $7.99?), Apple stepped into the original game of television content last November. It's called Apple TV. It only costs $4.99 a month and you can get a 7-day free trial. Sounds like a deal. But Apple's low cost is not just a sweaty form of industry competitiveness. Streaming service, which is now in state, has only a dozen original series. It also won't give you access to hundreds of licensed shows and movies like Netflix. Netflix has been building steam since its early DVD rental days (it's a circular disc that you put in a box of your non-Wi-Fi Wi-Fi The company was founded in 1997. Let it sink. Apple TV is only a few months away, but it hopes to pump out the kind of Emmy-caliber original Netflix series and Amazon took years to produce. Apple's first big push since See (starring Jason Momoa) is reportedly worth $15 million per episode. (It took HBO's Game of Thrones nearly eight seasons to reach such a budget, and even Netflix hyped Marco Polo's cost-only - $9 million per episode.) Of course, the Apple TV is only growing, and there are about 20 shows currently in development. By the time the streaming service turns 1, they will have many hours of content to go through. And maybe that $5 price tag goes away. Until then, here's every show currently on Apple TV. Five bucks could be worth it.
